On this perfect day I decided to do another issue of this this seasonal and fart-out zine that will give a total waste of your time LOL. I lied again when I told you that the last issue was the final none, it's been 2 years since the last release of this zine, but the itching sensation pushed me to do it again and more in the future, thanks to local zines, local bands, collective and the individuals (sadly most of them are either gone for good or very busy with their personal life) who inspired me positively to this give paper chance to be shared and be read. Life's too short to spend it hatred and sadness, travelling around and aural orgasm really helps me a lot to combat this total bullshit. All I want is positive energy and the need to be in control with myself,
because I have this tendency to be out of CONTROL.

The stabs of reality change me for the better (I believe), to learn from the past and never regret it, to forgive and forget, acceptance is the best way to embrace it all. To find goodness in everyone, in spite of the evilness that surrounds us all and terrorized the lives of the many, to hope for the best and expect for the worst with a smile. I hope you will enjoy this issue of another total random orgy of chaos. AMEN

The function of a society is to produce meaning — to come up with the trends, fashions, myths and agendas that people can collectively believe in. It's too bad that so much of the meaning we have been producing in the affluent West is toxic to ourselves and to other cultures that decide — with a considerable degree of coercion — to go along for the ride.

DEAR SATAN,

His Supreme Evil Majesty, it's been a while since I fiddled with your tail and trims your horns, insane as I thought so as to let you know why I've been hanging out with your unusual place. There is this one time that I'm feeling boring, lost and lonely, and I accidentally utter god's name like "OMFG!", god listens and he quickly gave me a guardian angel the moment when this long hair hot chick approach me with a bible clipped in her smooth armpit, and gave me a flyer that said "GOD LOVES YOU" and ask me to go in their Sunday service at 8am. That's the beginning of my salvation. You see I go to churchyard now and can pretend that I'm praying without ceasing, while slightly leering on those well endowed hot and healthy Christian school girls on my row, I believe this is a cool change for me.

The greatest about going to church is I can also enjoy Youthcrew posy finger pointing, and the gang vocals shouting the gospel of Jesus like "I am the way, the truth, the life"; unlike going to faggot metal shows and meeting mean eyes wearing the mask of darkness, to hide that that they are a wimp then in their high school days, getting bullied everyday because they are too busy masturbating in their math subject.

You lied to me, you said that having a Christian life will limit all the fun in life, in fact I can still take drugs, watch porn, masturbate, steal stuffs, hate, fuck and enjoy beer as much as I can. Now I know that you're a total bullshit, to hell with you, you evil crap. I went to this congregation even though you told me that It such a darn thing place to go with, but everyone there warmed me with their welcome, especially those chicks in the music ministry, dancing in their flaming all white suite gracing their nice curves, compare to those goatwhore in their rat scent leather boots and soaked armpits that smells like hell, not even worth a try for a blood sacrifice in your altar of madness.

You Satan are a complete bummer, Christianity has a far more brutal history that conquers half of the world I think, which made them more popular than any other religion, and the dosage of opiates is stronger than any other drugs that exist before and to this day. The lord told me that you fear the weakest saints while on their knees in prayer, it's hard to change from evil to godliness when your urge is harder than your faith, but through Christ Jesus I can pretend. Thanks God there's weed to see you twice.

One of my sins is hatred, for sure god will condone me if I will repent for it and doesn't mind if will continue doing it for the pleasure of celebrating life. I become a warrior for Christ not gimp like the legion of your followers, those pseudo haters of god who is bitching to bang your head as they play their alloy riffs, which they jam 1,000 times(in front of the mirror)while in the saloon of their gay metal friend fixing their dead hair, polishing the nails in their sweet potato feet after the relaxing spa.What a bunch of Satanic joke. sneersal in the gay metal friend

Satan you the end is near, as you strengthen your dominion to the bottomless pit. Please escort our President,VP,Cabinetmembers,Senators ,Congressmen,Governors, Mayors, Councilors, Barangay Chairman, Kagawad, Tanod, backstabbing friends, gossiping and noisy neighbors that is drugged by money,shabu and power, please take them with you, as well as your homeboy Anton Lavign who is the father or uncle of punk diva Avril Lavign (I think) With god in the lead there's no way out for you only in wet hell, Little Nicky will help me to let you realized that you are wronged when you decided to go down from heaven, and take the musical instruments with you, along with gods hot and Burning Angels. I

pow. made,
the ones who dest. through Christ

declare war against powers and principalities under your shade, the ones who destroys heart and soul, through Christ I will deliver myself from evil, but I will continue with my sins for the love of life. Dude it's time for me to finish my roll, good luck and Godspeed.

What is food? Looked at in biological terms, it would appear that food is merely a source of the energy and nutrients essential for life. However, viewed from an anthropological perspective, it becomes evident that food has played a central role in human history. While the everyday quest for food shaped the life of prehistoric man, the onset of the production of a reliable and sufficient supply of food is likely to have led to the rise of civilizations, and to human population expansion. Furthermore, the ability of man to colonize almost every part of the world is at least in part due to his adaptability with regard to food. Not only are humans omnivorous, they have also shown remarkable ingenuity in identifying and preparing nutritious foods out of unpromising materials. For example, bitter cassava (Manihot esculenta), a root crop that contains toxic levels of cyanide-producing compounds, comprises, after thorough processing, the major food item in the diet of millions of people worldwide.

Food for prehistoric man

The evidence used to determine which foods were eaten by prehistoric man is scarce and can be very difficult to interpret. The majority of clues about food usage come from the study of collections of animal bones, sea-food shell mounds, plant food remnants, and faecal remains, at or close to sites of human habitation. Studies of these food left-overs provide some hints as to what foods were available to and used by prehistoric man.

Until 10-12□000 years before the present (BP), humans relied on hunting and gathering for their food. They hunted wild animals such as gazelle, antelope, and deer, as well as fish, crabs, and migratory waterfowl, and gathered foods including shell-fish, root vegetables, grains, pulses, nuts, and fruit. The period between roughly 11□000 and 6000 years BP, which has been termed the Neolithic, was a time of crucial and widespread agricultural revolution. Wild crops such as wheat and barley began to be cultivated, and wild animals such as sheep and goats were tamed and then domesticated.

This shift from hunting and gathering to domestication and cultivation was very gradual and by no means universal (indeed some small isolated populations continue today to practise hunting and gathering as a mode of subsistence). However, the nature of the diet was altered considerably by the advent of farming. Pre-Neolithic man may well have consumed a large proportion of his diet in the form of animal products, with a lesser contribution coming from plant items. In contrast, the advent of plant cultivation led to certain crops, such as grains and root vegetables, becoming the main, or staple, part of human diets. As a consequence, the diet of Neolithic man was likely to have been dominated by these staple crops, with animal products making a considerably reduced contribution.

Food acquisition by hunting and gathering was time consuming and unpredictable. With the advent of farming, Neolithic man was, for the first time in human history, able to provide himself with a reliable and sufficient source of food. A major consequence of this was that as humans were no longer merely struggling from day to day to find sufficient food to survive; they could devote time to other matters. Most importantly, the availability of sufficient food led to a massive and unprecedented growth in the human population.

Food for modern man

Over the past 2000 years there have been substantial increases not only in the quantity but also in the quality of the food available to man. Early inventions such as new forms of plough enabled the cultivation of virgin lands, and practices such as crop rotation, which allowed soil to become reinvigorated between plantings, significantly increased food production. The mechanization of seed planting, harvesting, and threshing during the Industrial Revolution made agricultural production even more efficient.

However, this enhanced production led to a new set of problems, as it demanded innovative storage techniques and improved transport capabilities to avoid the produce spoiling before it was consumed. Salting and smoking had long been known as methods for preserving foods over extended periods of time. Canning was perfected in the early 1800s and quickly became popular as a convenient, cheap, and safe method of conserving pre-cooked food. Chilling or freezing was originally only available as a method of food preservation to those with a ready supply of ice. However, with the invention of ice-making machines in the 1830s, ice became widely available, and fresh fruit, meat, and fish could be conserved. Finally, the advent of fast and refrigerated transportation enabled fresh foods to be delivered in their original form to consumers around the world.

In order to ensure that the food supplied to the public is of adequate quality, many countries have set up agencies to monitor food safety. These agencies are designed to protect the consumer and improve the health of the public in relation to food by providing advice and information on food consumption. Furthermore, such agencies develop policies relating to food safety, and, by carrying out their own research, monitor relevant developments in science, technology, and other fields of knowledge related to food.

As a result of the slow but continual development of production, preservation, and safety technology, contemporary humans in developed countries have access to an astonishing quantity and diversity of foods. In the past, only locally-produced, in-season foods were available to consumers, but modern technology has now made it possible to supply consumers with foods produced in countries from around the world throughout the year.

Food for thought

The question of whether there is sufficient food to feed the world's ever-increasing population has exercised the minds of philosophers, economists, agronomists, and demographers for many centuries. In 1798, Thomas Malthus, an English political economist, wrote a paper entitled An essay on the principle of population, which still provokes heated debate. Malthus suggested that the world's population, growing at a geometric rate, was increasing at a much faster rate than the world's food production, which only increased arithmetically. Malthus argued that if a balance between population and food was not maintained, and the world's population grew to a size that was not sustainable by contemporary food production practices, then the consequence would be widespread famine.

The opposing viewpoint to that of Malthus suggests that increased population size is both a sign and a cause of prosperity, and that flexible and efficient markets can overcome any problems associated with an imbalance between population size and food production. This argument assumes that improving technology via scientific and agricultural innovation will ensure a steady and continual increase in food production. To support this assumption, anti-Malthusians suggest that increased population size will lead to a larger number of farmers tending ever-larger amounts of land, and that this will in turn precipitate innovation in land use and agricultural techniques.

There is good evidence that food production and crop yields have indeed increased sufficiently to cope with the increase in population size, but there are worrying signs that the rate of increase of crop yields is declining. This slowdown is no doubt due to a combination of causes: farmers may well be approaching the absolute maximum possible crop yields, and the cumulative effects of environmental degradation, partly caused by agriculture itself, may also be responsible. Considerable evidence suggests that, at least in some of the world's poorest countries, years of intensive agriculture, often coupled with long periods of drought, have led to the nutrient-exhaustion and desiccation of farming land. Such land is significantly less fertile and quickly becomes unable to support an ever-increasing population. Areas where this has occurred have been labelled demographically entrapped, as their projected population exceeds that which can be fed by local food production capabilities. In the absence of international food aid programmes, these countries, which typically lack trade and migratory safety valves, are thought to be facing uncertain futures of starvation, disease, and internal conflict.

Since Neolithic times, humans have carefully selected and bred plant and animal organisms that have demonstrated favourable traits. These selectively-enhanced descendants, with characteristics such as greater yield or improved flavour, often show little resemblance to the wild varieties. This ancient technology was further exploited between 1960 and 1980, during which laboratory-bred, high-yield cereal grains fed much of the world's expanding human population: the so-called 'Green Revolution'. However, these increases in yield may have led to environmental degradation through the exhaustion of ecological capital such as topsoil and groundwater. In response to the need for more productive and more environmentally friendly crops, modern advances in biotechnology have produced genetically-modified or GM crops. GM crops typically contain gene alterations which confer agronomic benefits such as resistance to pests or to herbicides. These traits can reduce costs to the farmer and can also be beneficial to the environment, as they theoretically decrease the amount of insecticides and herbicides required. However, while such advances may be extremely useful in balancing world food production with population, there has been considerable public concern about this new technology and much more long-term research is still required.

Ironically, while the health of people in developed countries suffers from an excess of food leading to obesity, many developing countries face a stark future. Recent estimates have suggested that almost one-tenth of the world's population is malnourished in ways that impair health, and that the absolute number of malnourished persons, especially children, continues to grow. It is clear that food will continue to play a crucial role in human history for the foreseeable future.

SCRAWLSHOP

THIS IS ONE OF THE PINOY UNDERGROUND ZINE THAT I LOOK UP TO, THE EXISTENCE OF THIS ZINE INSPIRED ME A LOT. LESS TALK, MORE METAL. AND THAT IS THE SCRAWLSHOP ZINE, THE HELL-BENT ZINE THAT IS. SO HERE IS THE MAKER OF THAT ZINE TO LAY DOWN A FEW WORDS.

How long have you been doing the SCRAWLSHOP zine and how did you get hooked into this?

I've been doing the zine on and off since 1996. when i was a kid i made crappy diy comics and when i got older i wanted to do a zine. the cult zines back in the 90's were my biggest inspirations especially W.R.I.N.G. and RATROACH zine. also Black Market zine, Answer Me! And oldschool death and black metal zines

Do you have any previous zine aside from SCRAWLSHOP? how many issues do you have in a volume and what is your ritual before you sit down and write?

none.

i have more than 13 issues out because i started it at issue # 0 which was the first issue. but the early issues were crap except the band interviews. no rituals before writing. but sometimes i do some bonghits or don't sleep hehe

Sorry no space available anymore

the Scrawlshopzine interview is to be concluded on the next issue so

I have a reason to do another one again =)

I woke up this morning to discover that my world is constructed. The "free market" has selected everything I eat, wear and enjoy. This is a market so free that the majority of the great wealth generated by it rests in the hands of only 10 percent of the human population. I watch television and read magazines that tell me the path to happiness is consumption. If I buy a new car or television I will be happy. The unneeded items in life represent our power, how far up we have climbed.
